

Remembering Neville's fishing days

Neville potting on 'Blue Hooker'

'Blue Hooker' the Andrews family favourite of Neville's many boats that he fished from Port Isaac on - Family Andrews had lots of family days out with this boat. From Port Isaac 'Blue Hooker' went to Padstow and then to Clovelly where sadly she sank at sea with the loss of the lives of the two young men on board

During a visit to Port Isaac as part of his survey of Cornish fishing villages, Gunter Leng, a German student, spent some time watching Neville Andrews (left) a local fisherman, baiting his crab pots.

"Dunelin' in Port Isaac Harbour Cal's (Greenhalgh - see separate display) first ever fishing trip was on this boat

Above: Neville with old style pots

Right: The Andrews family start young! Tracey (married to Calum) as a baby going fishing!

Praise for villagers who helped a student

STAYING for five weeks at Mevagissey in order to make a detailed survey for a geography thesis he is compiling about the fishing and holiday industries in Cornwall, a German student has found the people very helpful. He has called on practically every household and says that about 98 per cent. of the people answered his questions. Gunter Leng, aged 27, who is a student at Exeter University, aimed to study the changes which have taken place in Cornish fishing villages as the result of the decline of the fishing industry and the growth of the holiday trade. He chose five related villages which have undergone changes in character and function—Mousehole, Cadgwith, Polperro, Port Isaac and Mevagissey, where he stayed to round off his story. Mr. Leng is grateful for the help of the many friends he has made during his stay, and for the time they have spent in helping him with his project.

Greg Hingley, who used to help Nev during the holidays, asleep on 'Blue Hooker'

Boats in Port Isaac harbour in a storm

